

All of the gods in Pathfinder and D&D lore are worshipped or believed in to some extent in Caecilius, but the peoples understanding of gods and their direct and explicit influences on the world are limited.

Many people believe that a cleric or champion being able to draw their power from a god is enough to prove their existence and any gods with no such empowered followers have their existences regularly doubted

On the other hand, recorded instances of gods speaking directly to their followers or appearing before them are few and doubted.

Some scholars expect that belief in and worship of specific aspects of the universe can magically empower their followers according to their own beliefs, regardless of whether those gods are listening or even exist in the first place, others testify direct contact with gods or explanations from other extra planer entities that know more of the universe than its average denizen.

The cosmology of the multiverse and other planes are also not understood to their full extent, though evidence exists of many other planes and they can be readily interacted with and studied through magical means. However, not much in the way of scientific understanding exists.

In reality, not understood by anyone within the setting, the material plane in which Caecilius exists is in a weird position within the multiverse where it holds a loose connection to many different gods and planes but lacks consistent presence or intervention by them.

The powers of these gods can be called upon as normal, though only a truly exceptional person or circumstance could summon them back to the world.

For similar reasons, other extra-planer activity is lessened on this world except in a few specific areas of higher magical intensity.

Because of this, witches and warlocks are quite rare and most religious zealots never find a strong enough connection to their gods to become clerics or champions.

Those who do form a connection with their gods will rarely hear from them directly, unless they are truly exceptional.